The Little Boy

He stands so tall and bold a soldier of the war but deep inside his courage fades the wound his mind must bore.

He's still a little boy though in age he is a man a task in which he must now face a gun held in his hand.

"I'm not a coward," he proclaims
"But I am not a man, a little boy resides in me, why can't you understand."

His nation is in need of him their pride is on the line the courage they demand of him is more than he can find.

He's sent off in a hurried rush no man to heed his cry now he lies beside the ground a tear filled wretched eye.

He dispenses one last breath of fate and slowly drifts away so quiet on the battlefield that bloody war torn day.

I wrote the following poem as a 14 year old in 1985. I visited Washington, D.C. in 1987 and had planned to place this at the wall of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, The Wall but forgot it in a drawer at home. All these years I've wanted to thank the servicemen who have fought for our country. I having lost my grandfather in ww11, long before I was ever born. My children are young, and I fear that some day they may have to go to war. I do not long for a day when that might happen and truthfully I would do anything in my power to keep them safe, but I also want them to understand that many have gone to war to keep us safe at night. I'm very grateful for the opportunity to have been born in the United States and to be so young as to not have seen the pangs of war myself. Thanks to all of the servicemen who have given their bodies and soul for my family and each of us here. Lynette Bachert
